If you're prescribed an antipsychotic medicine, you'll need to have regular health checks at least every three months, but possibly more often, particularly if you have diabetes. Antipsychotic medicines are sometimes prescribed to treat episodes of mania or hypomania. To purchase this item you must have a private prescription from your doctor or medical profession. If it's incorrect, you may get side effects such as diarrhoea and vomiting. At which point your order will be dispatched. Blood tests to check your liver and kidney function will be carried out when you start taking carbamazepine, and again after six months. Carbamazepine is usually only prescribed on the advice of an expert in bipolar disorder. The plan should be drawn up with the patient, her partner, her obstetrician pregnancy specialist, midwife, GP and health visitor. You'll also need to have a blood count at the start and after six months, and you may also have your weight and height monitored. Read more about living with bipolar disorder. In women, your GP may decide to use valproate if there's no alternative or if you've been assessed and it's unlikely you'll respond to other treatments, although they'll need to check you're using a reliable contraception and advise you on the risks of taking the medicine during pregnancy. These can include one or more of the following: Check here for alerts.
